

RATIONAL

Lichen sclerosus is a chronic inflammatory skin disease frequently associated with a high degree of scarring and an elevated risk of cancer in the genital area. It causes remarkable alterations in sexuality, pain and a deep relational discomfort in both sexes. However, in the field of andrology, it is often considered a condition of secondary importance compared to other genital diseases and it can be underdiagnosed and undertreated. Our hope is that this day may encourage other training and prevention initiatives for this challenging chronic dermatosis
